

Phoenix Conversions — July 2026 Digital Advertising Summary

Reporting period: July 1 – July 31, 2026

The July Backdrop

July is peak truck season in East Tennessee. Lake weekends, Smokies trips, and job sites running full tilt all put trucks in front of their owners every day — which is exactly when bed covers, lift kits, and racks start feeling like a purchase rather than a someday. The month's numbers reflect that: the campaigns reached considerably more people than in June, and the site drew its biggest audience of the summer.

July's Headline Figures

- Search ad impressions: 19,518 (up 30% from June's 15,031) with 1,277 clicks
- Search market share: 13.52% (up from 10.35% — the strongest position in months)
- Total tracked ad conversions: 611 (up 44% from about 423)
- Calls from ads directly: 92 (June 97, May 84)
- Calls placed from the website by ad visitors: 143 (June 150, May 130)
- All website calls, every source: 419 (June 441, May 382)
- Total website visitors: 3,899 (up 18%)
- Display ads shown: 299,530 times with 1,649 clicks (up 20% in clicks)

What Stood Out

Visibility took a real step up. Market share — the share of relevant truck-accessory searches where a Phoenix ad appeared — climbed from 10.35% to 13.52%. Impressions rose 30% while click volume held steady, which means the campaigns were shown to a meaningfully wider pool of shoppers without giving up efficiency. Bedliner, which had been effectively dormant, came back online and immediately posted a 30.67% market share on small volume.

Total conversions jumped 44%. The tracked-conversion figure counts every meaningful action the ads produced — calls, form contacts, direction taps, key page visits — and it rose from roughly 423 to 611. Vehicle Customizations alone accounted for about 246 of those. That's the broadest measure of the campaigns doing their job, and it moved sharply in the right direction.

Phone volume eased off June's peak, but stayed well above the spring. Direct calls from ads came in at 92 versus June's 97, and website calls from ad visitors at 143 versus 150 — both roughly 5% lighter. Worth stating plainly rather than glossing over. The useful context: June was the best call month of the year, and July still sits comfortably above May (84 direct calls) and the months before it. This is a step back from a peak, not a slide in demand — and it happened in a month when overall reach and total conversions both grew.

Direction taps came in at 22, down from June's 27 but still ahead of May's 18. Across all traffic sources, direction requests held exactly flat at 47.

Campaign Detail

Vehicle Customizations is carrying the phone. It generated 53 of the month's 92 direct calls from just 3,079 impressions — by far the most call-productive campaign in the account. Truck Customization (28 calls) and Truck Custom Shop (14 calls) were the two ad groups doing the heavy lifting. When someone searches for a truck customization shop, they're ready to talk to a person, and that shows.

Bed Cover produced 19 calls on 1,609 impressions, its usual strong summer showing, spread across Truck Bed Cover, Tonneau Cover, and A.R.E. searches. Truck Accessories remained the volume leader at 11,069 impressions and 490 clicks, with running boards, lift kits, and suspension the most-clicked categories. Commercial Brand/Category held the account's highest market share at 24.38% — Phoenix appears in roughly a quarter of relevant commercial-vehicle searches, a strong defensive position in that segment.

On the display side — think of these as digital billboards following truck shoppers around the web — the Commercial Upfitting and Consumer Product campaigns delivered 299,530 impressions between them and 1,649 clicks, a 20% increase in click volume. Meta (Facebook and Instagram) added 144,871 impressions.

The Audience and the Map

The ad audience remained strongly male (85.8%) and concentrated in the 55–64 age bracket (41.6%), followed by 45–54 — the established truck-owner profile the campaigns are built around.

Knoxville led on exposure as always (64,228 impressions, 611 clicks), but the story of the month is Sevierville, which nearly doubled its footprint to 54,559 impressions and 386 clicks. Crossville, Maryville, Pittman Center, and Tellico Village rounded out the top markets. The pull from the Sevier County corridor is worth noting — that's tourist-season truck traffic and a market that has been growing steadily in this account.

Non-Paid Traffic

Traffic that arrives without an ad tells you how the brand itself is doing, and July was strong there. Direct visits — people typing the address or using a bookmark — climbed to 1,098 from 621, a 77% jump. Organic search visits rose to 945 from 804. Together those two sources drove most of the month's 18% growth in total site visitors, and they're the clearest indication that the name is sticking with people beyond the moment they see an ad.

One measurement note: average time on site continues to read lower than earlier in the year (25 seconds across all visitors). This traces back to the site housekeeping done in June — the discontinued e-commerce shop link and the full Wil-Ro brand section were both removed, so there are simply fewer pages for a visitor to move through. July was the first complete month without them. The engagement rate — the share of visits that show real interaction — actually improved for ad visitors, up 4% to 39.43%. Fewer pages per visit, same interest level.

Where This Leaves August

July widened the funnel: more searches reached, better market position, more total conversions, and a bigger overall audience. Phone volume gave back a small amount against a peak month while holding well above the spring baseline. The setup heading into August — still firmly in truck season, with a stronger visibility position than the campaigns had in June — is a good one. The focus is converting that expanded reach back into call volume.
